No. .....

Hewlett-Packard Company, a corporation; David Packard; and Wilfred F. Cavier, Petitioners,

vs.

United States of America,
Respondent.

Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

Hewlett-Packard Company, David Packard and Wilfred F. Cavier (herein collectively referred to as "Petitioner") pray that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment entered in this case on November 15, 1967, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, which affirmed the judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Southern Division, entered June 29, 1967.

OPINIONS BELOW

The District Court filed no opinion in this case. Its Order and Judgment (R. 141-143)[1] is printed herein in Appendix B, infra, at pp. 8-11. The opinion of the Court of Appeals (R. 154-160), printed in Appendix B, infra, at pp. 12-18 is reported at ..... F.2d ..... (November 15, 1967).

JURISDICTION

The Judgment of the Court of Appeals was rendered and entered on November 15, 1967 (R. 161). No petition for rehearing was filed. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether under the provisions of 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) the United States, after entering into firm fixed-price contracts for standard commercial articles pursuant to regular procurement procedures by which the United States did not consider or rely in any way upon costs or estimated costs of production, is nevertheless entitled subsequent to performance of the contracts to examine all books and records of the contractor relating to the cost of producing the contract items.

2. Whether a contractor who has entered into a firm fixed-price contract for standard commercial articles with the United States by which the contracting parties have agreed that cost of production data is not applicable to the contract can be compelled after the contract has been performed to permit the United States to examine his records disclosing the cost of producing the contract items.

3. Whether the court below erred in holding that the word "contract" as used in 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) does not mean the specific agreement between the parties but has a broad meaning embracing the general subject matter of the procurement of described property by the United States.

STATUTES AND REGULATIONS INVOLVED

This case involves an interpretation of 10 U.S.C. § 2313 (b), which provides:

> (b) Except as provided in subsection (c), each contract negotiated under this chapter shall provide that the Comptroller General and his representatives are entitled, until the expiration of three years after final payment, to examine any books, documents, papers, or records of the contractor, or any of his subcontractors, that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract or subcontract.[2]

The case also involves 10 U.S.C. § 2306(f), 18 U.S.C. § 1905 and §§ 1-201.6, 3-403, 3-403.1 and 7-104.15 of the Armed Services Procurement Regulation (as the same were in effect when the contracts here involved were executed), all of which are set forth in Appendix A, infra.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Hewlett-Packard Company[3] is, and for many years has been, a manufacturer of electronic test and measurement equipment designed for general use where great precision in measurement is required. This proceeding involves a controversy between the Comptroller General of the United States of America and Hewlett-Packard as to the meaning and application of a contract provision for examination of books and records of the contractor inserted pursuant to the mandate of 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) in four negotiated firm fixed-price contracts for electronic test and measurement equipment which were awarded to Hewlett-Packard by the Air Force during the period from March, 1959 to January, 1961 (R. 20-21). The items covered by the contracts were all standard commercial items listed in the Company's catalog at established prices, some of which had been in effect for many years. The contract prices were negotiated on the basis of listed catalog prices, less a volume discount, pursuant to regular Armed Services Procurement procedures then authorizing this type of negotiation, in the course of which the United States did not consider or rely in any way upon costs or estimated costs of production (R. 22-23A). The procurement procedures contemplated that the United States would rely, and it did in fact rely, on the disciplines of the commercial market place to establish reasonable contract prices and the fixed prices so established were not subject to any subsequent adjustment (R. 22-23).

Pursuant to the statutory mandate of 10 U.S.C. § 2313, each of the four contracts contained among its general provisions a "Clause 10" reading as follows:

> 10. Examination of Records
> (a) The Contractor agrees that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall, until the expiration of three years after final payment under this contract, have access to and the right to examine any directly pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the Contractor involving transactions related to this contract.

> (b) The Contractor further agrees to include in all his subcontracts hereunder a provision to the effect that the subcontractor agrees that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall, until the expiration of three years after final payment under the subcontract, have access to and the right to examine any directly pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of such subcontractor, involving transactions related to the subcontract. The term "subcontract" as used in this clause excludes (i) purchase orders not exceeding $1,000 and (ii) subcontracts or purchase orders for public utility services at rates established for uniform applicability to the general public.

In September, 1962, representatives of the Comptroller General, purporting to exercise rights accorded by Clause 10 of these contracts, commenced an examination of the books and records of Hewlett-Packard relating to these four contracts. During the course of this examination, the Company permitted access to books and records relating to sales prices of various instruments and parts (R. 23A). On November 14, 1962, a representative of the Comptroller General requested "all books, documents, papers or records relating to the pricing and cost of performance, support for prices charged to the government, and such other necessary information which would permit such representatives to review the reasonableness of the contract prices provided for in the aforesaid contracts." This request was refused by Hewlett-Packard on the ground that cost of production information was not directly pertinent to these contracts (R. 4, 23A). The United States then brought this action to enforce the government's asserted right of examination, seeking both declaratory and injunctive relief (R. 1-7). After the defendants filed a responsive pleading, the parties stipulated as to the relevant facts and filed cross motions for summary judgment (R. 20, 28, 51). The District Court granted the motion of the United States, denied that of Hewlett-Packard and entered a judgment substantially as prayed for in the complaint (R. 141-143).

Hewlett-Packard appealed upon the ground that the District Court misinterpreted the provisions of 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) and failed to give effect to the words of the statute (and of Clause 10) which limit the records of the contractor or subcontractor which may be examined by the Comptroller General to those "that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract or subcontract." The Court of Appeals affirmed, stating:

> "The key word in the limitation clause is 'contract.' If that word is used in section 2313(b) only with reference to the terms and conditions of an agreement and the procedures whereby those terms and conditions were formulated, then the district court failed to give full effect to the limitation clause. As Hewlett-Packard correctly points out, under the stipulated facts summarized above, production costs were not taken into consideration in arriving at the terms and conditions of the contracts in question. Thus data pertaining to production costs could not be said to directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract, as so defined.
> In our opinion, however, the word 'contract,' as used in this statute is intended to have a broader meaning, embracing not only the specific terms and conditions of the agreement, but also the general subject matter. The subject matter of these four contracts is the procurement of described property by the Government." (R. 158-159)

The Court of Appeals held that production costs directly pertained to the subject matter as thus broadly defined by the court. Petitioner contends that the interpretation thus given the word "contract" is erroneous.

REASONS FOR ALLOWANCE OF WRIT

1. The court below has decided an important question of interpretation of a major federal statute which should be settled by this Court.

The provision for examination of certain records of the contractor contained in 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) was initially adopted by the Congress in 1951.[4] This case is the first reported case which interprets this provision and it will therefore constitute the only precedent as to the proper interpretation of this statute which is an integral and important part of the statutes regulating procurement of materials by the United States. National procurement policies have added significance under the world conditions with which the United States is presently confronted.

The provision itself is required to be included in all negotiated contracts of the United States involving more than $2,500 in amount and is a part of the standard form government contract (R. 24). The decision herein accordingly will affect every person who has negotiated, or in the future negotiates, a contract for the sale of more than $2,500 of articles to the United States.[5] To the many thousands of such persons there must also be added all subcontractors who supply more than $2,500 of items to the primary contractors, as § 2313(b) makes mandatory the inclusion of this provision in all subcontracts. For this reason, this case is of vital importance to the entire scheme of federal government contract negotiations.

The United States has recognized the importance of this question of statutory interpretation, for at the commence-

4. Public Law 81-921; 64 Stat. 1257. Codification into Title 10 United States Code occurred in 1956; Public Law 85-568; 70A Stat. 127, 133.

5. The monetary exemption was raised from $1,000 to $2,500 in 1959. See ASPR § 7-104.15, 32 C.F.R. § 7.104-15 (1960), 24 Federal Register 891.

ment of his oral argument before the District Court, the Chief of the General Litigation Section of the Department of Justice stated:

> "The Court appreciates, of course, that this is really the interpretation of a statute which applies to a great many contracts, and it is of considerable significance not only to the litigants here today, but to the interpretation of this statute in its national application." (R. Vol. II, p. 5)

An issue of this magnitude should be settled by the Supreme Court. This Court has on a number of occasions recognized the desirability of itself settling matters of interpretation of clauses in standard form government contracts which are likely to affect many contractors. For example, this Court granted certiorari to review decisions interpreting the disputes clause of a standard form government contract in U. S. v. Moorman, 338 U.S. 457 (1950), and U. S. v. Wunderlich, 342 U.S. 98 (1951); to review a decision interpreting the Walsh-Healey Act provision of a standard form government contract in Endicott-Johnson Corp. v. Perkins, 317 U.S. 501 (1943); and to review a decision interpreting the tax clause of a standard form government contract in U. S. v. Glenn L. Martin Co., 308 U.S. 62 (1939).

As the facts are neither complicated nor in dispute, this case is one which can readily be decided by the Supreme Court without undue expenditure of the Court's time.

2. A final decision by this Court is necessary to avoid confusion in the administration of long-established United States government procurement policies.

Existing government procurement policies of long standing declare that it is the policy of the United States to rely on the disciplines of the commercial market place in establishing reasonable contract prices for standard commercial articles (ASPR § 3-403.1, 32 C.F.R. § 3.403-1 (1960); Defense Procurement Circular No. 5, May 12, 1964).[6] These policies are reflected in and implemented by the Truth in Negotiations Act (Public Law 87-653; 76 Stat. 528) which defines the circumstances under which cost data is to be supplied to the government by the contractor and makes effective provision for the matter of reliance thereon by requiring subsequent contract price adjustment where data supplied is inaccurate, incomplete or non-current, but then provides that these requirements need not be applicable to "contracts or subcontracts where the price negotiated is based on * * * established catalog or market prices of commercial items sold in substantial quantities to the general public" (10 U.S.C. § 2306(f)). This is legislative recognition that cost data is not directly pertinent to contracts for standard commercial articles at the time of negotiation. This Truth in Negotiations Act would be completely inconsistent with the examination of records statute if the Comptroller General has unrestricted powers of subsequent examination, since the Congress would be saying on the one hand to the procurement agencies "you do not need to rely on cost data in procurement negotiations for standard commercial products" and on the other hand "we nevertheless expect the Comptroller General to audit and criticize the profit margins under these same contracts after performance has been completed." If profits are not a material

6. In Senate Report 643, July 25, 1953, 3 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News (1954), p. 3880, the committee gave the following reasons for making the exemption of standard commercial articles from the Renegotiation Act mandatory rather than permissive:

> "The committee believes that in the case of standard commercial articles there is in most cases no basis or need for renegotiation since cost and pricing experience has already been acquired and prices made in a competitive market."

factor in the negotiation or performance of the contract, they should be of no concern thereafter.

These well established policies have led contractors to believe that they are not required to furnish the United States with cost of production data with respect to negotiated contracts based on the presence of adequate competition or established catalog or commercial market prices. Countless individuals and business firms have entered into contracts with various agencies of the United States upon the assumption that their rights of privacy for confidential data were inviolate and that their obligations of disclosure were measured by the requirements imposed as a part of the contract negotiation. This fundamental assumption is thrown into serious question by the decision of the court below which requires the contractor to make available to the United States for subsequent examination its records of the cost of producing the items sold under contracts in which the costs of production were not considered relevant when each contract itself was negotiated.

This Court should clarify the extent to which rights of privacy as to confidential business data are still preserved to contractors dealing with the United States. If the consequence of negotiating any contract with the United States involving more than $2,500 is to expose the contractor to the risk of subsequently being required to disclose his confidential costs of production, this result should be based on a decision of this Court. It is particularly desirable that this issue be settled with finality, as a result of the present decision can well be that contractors may refuse to deal with the government by negotiated contracts for items as to which the costs of production are considered confidential. Such a result could have serious repercussions upon the general procurement program.

3. The decision of the court below creates an obstacle to the performance of existing contracts with the United States.

Section 2313(b) and Clause 10 provide that the right of access to records extends to those of any subcontractor. This means that if the United States has the broad rights of subsequent inspection as determined by the court below, it can be very difficult, if not impossible, for the prime contractor to procure necessary materials to perform his contract, as the suppliers may be entirely unwilling to make their books and records available to the United States as a condition of furnishing materials to the prime contractor.

The situation of the subcontractor is rendered especially uncertain by the decision of the court below as the requirements of § 2313(b) and Clause 10 extend to all subcontractors even though that clause is not actually contained in those particular contracts. Paul v. United States, 371 U.S. 245, 255 (1962); G. L. Christian & Associates v. United States, 320 F.2d 345, 350-351 (Ct. of Clms, 1963); certiorari denied 375 U.S. 954. Accordingly, a subcontractor who is not even aware of his exposure may be subject to these broad rights of investigation.

4. The decision of the court below holds that there are vested in the Comptroller General extensive investigative powers which can strip away the confidential status afforded business data by the provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 1905.

Rights of privacy with respect to confidential business data are extremely important in a competitive society. The Congress of the United States has recognized both the importance and the confidential nature of vital business data by prohibiting its disclosure by any officer or employee of the United States or any department or agency thereof. See 18 U.S.C. § 1905 which is set out in Appendix A, infra at pp. 3-4. The Comptroller General does not recognize the provisions of this statute as being applicable to him and asserts that his investigative powers are not subject to the restraints of this statute as he is a part of the investigative arm of the Congress itself. Accordingly, the Comptroller General is in a position to disclose publicly the results of his investigation and thereby frustrate the confidentiality afforded by § 1905. This circumstance strongly suggests that the limits (or absence thereof) of such broad investigative powers should be determined by the Supreme Court.

5. The court below erroneously interpreted the key word "contract" and thereby reached a wrong conclusion which should be corrected by this Court.

The decision of the court below recognizes that:

> "The key word in the limitation clause is 'contract.' If that word is used in section 2313(b) only with reference to the terms and conditions of an agreement and the procedures whereby those terms and conditions were formulated, then the district court failed to give full effect to the limitation clause. As Hewlett-Packard correctly points out, under the stipulated facts summarized above, production costs were not taken into consideration in arriving at the terms and conditions of the contracts in question. Thus data pertaining to production costs could not be said to directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract, as so defined.
> In our opinion, however, the word 'contract,' as used in this statute is intended to have a broader meaning, embracing not only the specific terms and conditions of the agreement, but also the general subject matter. The subject matter of these four contracts is the procurement of described property by the Government." (R. 158-159)

This statement is the crux of the present controversy. Petitioner submits that the word "contract" as used in § 2313(b) is to be interpreted in accordance with customary usage of the English language and in context can only mean the specific negotiated agreement between the parties—the word should not be expanded by the process of interpretation to encompass the general subject matter of procurement of property by the government.

"Contract" is a term of ordinary usage which has long had the generally accepted meaning of a legally enforceable agreement between two or more parties. The most often quoted definition is based on Blackstone's Commentaries (2 Blackstone, Commentaries 442) and as phrased by the Supreme Court is as follows:

> "A contract is defined by all to be an agreement to do, or not to do, some particular act; * * *" Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 256 (1827)

This is likewise the definition recognized in standard dictionaries, as Webster's New Third International Dictionary defines the noun "contract" as:

> "* * * 1 a: an agreement between two or more persons or parties to do or not to do something: BARGAIN, COMPACT, COVENANT; esp: an agreement that is legally enforceable * * *"

The Armed Services Procurement Regulation as in effect when the contracts here involved were executed contained a definition of the word in the plural as follows:

> "1-201.6 Contracts means all types of agreements and orders for the procurement of supplies or services. It includes awards and preliminary notices of award; contracts of a fixed-price, cost, cost-plus-a-fixed-fee, or incentive type; contracts providing for the issuance of job orders, task orders, or task letters thereunder; letter contracts, letters of intent, and purchase orders. It also includes amendments and supplemental agreements with respect to any of the foregoing." 32 C.F.R. § 1.201-6 (1954)

As used in this Regulation, the word "contract" plainly referred to a specific agreement.

The basic requirement of § 2313(b) itself is that "Each contract negotiated under this chapter shall provide" for the examination of records directly pertaining to "the contract." (Emphasis supplied.) The agreement between the parties is the only subject matter which can be "negotiated" and in which a specific provision can be inserted so there can be no doubt that "the contract" means the specific and restricted subject matter which comprises the agreement between the parties.

Clause 10, upon which the Government is basing its demands for inspection of records in this case, is itself simply part of the "General Provisions" of a "Supply Contract" (Standard Form 32). By its terms this clause becomes applicable only to a specific agreement which meets certain qualifications, as the clause provides:

The government contract form is replete with references to "this contract" and its identity as a separate and specific agreement is emphasized by the qualification as to dollar amount and the use of the words "entered into". This is the language of specific agreement and is consistent only with the concept that the word "contract" means the negotiated agreement between the parties. Such a specific agreement has definite terms and conditions which can be interpreted in the light of the intention of the parties. This is the natural and usual meaning of the term "contract" and is therefore the meaning which must be given to that term when it is used in § 2313(b) and Clause 10.

Such rights of examination of records as the government may have are solely based on the fact that Hewlett-Packard has entered into a "contract" with the government—there are otherwise no rights of examination—and this fact points directly at the negotiated agreement as the significant subject matter.

There is simply no basis for an expansion of the meaning of the word "contract" to include "the general subject matter" of "the procurement of described property by the government." The practical result of this expansion is that no effective restraint has been imposed upon the rights of examination conferred upon the Comptroller General and the limitation clause in substance has been deleted from the statute. Such expansion is legislation—not valid interpretation. But this unsupportable interpretation is the basis of the decision of the court below. If the word "contract" had been given its normal and usual meaning, then as stated in its decision the court below would have been compelled to conclude that:

> "* * * the district court failed to give full effect to the limitation clause. As Hewlett-Packard correctly points out, under the stipulated facts summarized above, production costs were not taken into consideration in arriving at the terms and conditions of the contracts in question. Thus data pertaining to production costs could not be said to directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract, as so defined." (R. 158-159)

This conclusion was avoided only by the extraordinary interpretation placed upon the key word "contract".

It is important to emphasize that under the facts of this case, the contracts involved relate only to standard commercial articles sold in substantial quantities to the general public. The petitioner recognizes that there are many contracts negotiated by government contracting agencies where there is no established public market price and the negotiation procedure is therefore likely to include both consideration of and reliance on estimated costs of production. In those types of contracts costs of production can be directly pertinent to the particular contracts, for the determination of what is directly pertinent and involves transactions relating to specific contracts can only be made upon the basis of the facts concerning the negotiation of those contracts, their subject matter and their performance. In the instant case, the stipulated facts demonstrate that Hewlett-Packard's costs of production were not considered in the course of the contract negotiation, were not relied upon in any way by the contracting officers of the Air Force and are not now germane to a determination of whether those contracts have been performed in accordance with their terms. It was therefore erroneous to give to the Comptroller General the right to examine any records of Hewlett-Packard relating to the costs of production or margins of profit on these four contracts. This error results from an incorrect interpretation of the key word "contract" in 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) and this Court should grant a hearing in order that the words of this important statute may be given their usual and customary meaning.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

Title 10 United States Code

§ 2313. Examination of books and records of contractor*

(a) An agency named in section 2303 of this title is entitled, through an authorized representative, to inspect the plant and audit the books and records of—

(1) a contractor performing a cost or cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract made by that agency under this chapter; and

(2) a subcontractor performing any subcontract under a cost or cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract made by that agency under this chapter.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (c), each contract negotiated under this chapter shall provide that the Comptroller General and his representatives are entitled, until the expiration of three years after final payment, to examine any books, documents, papers, or records of the contractor, or any of his subcontractors, that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract or subcontract.

(c) Subsection (b) does not apply to a contract or subcontract with a foreign contractor or foreign subcontractor if the head of the agency determines, with the concurrence of the Comptroller General or his designee, that the application of that subsection to the contract or subcontract would not be in the public interest. However, the concurrence of the Comptroller General or his designee is not required—

*The phrase "except as provided in subsection (c)," in subsection (b), and subsection (c) were added September 27, 1966 by Public Law 89-607, § 1(2), 80 Stat. 850.

(1) where the contractor or subcontractor is a foreign government or agency thereof or is precluded by the laws of the country involved from making its books, documents, papers, or records available for examination; and

(2) where the head of the agency determines, after taking into account the price and availability of the property or services from United States sources, that the public interest would be best served by not applying subsection (b).

If subsection (b) is not applied to a contract or subcontract based on a determination under clause (2), a written report shall be furnished to the Congress.

"A prime contractor or any subcontractor shall be required to submit cost or pricing data under the circumstances listed below, and shall be required to certify that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the cost or pricing data he submitted was accurate, complete and current—

"(1) Prior to the award of any negotiated prime contract under this title where the price is expected to exceed $100,000;

"(2) Prior to the pricing of any contract change or modification for which the price adjustment is expected to exceed $100,000, or such lesser amount as may be prescribed by the head of the agency;

"(3) Prior to the award of a subcontract at any tier, where the prime contractor and each higher tier subcontractor have been required to furnish such a certificate, if the price of such subcontract is expected to exceed $100,000; or

"(4) Prior to the pricing of any contract change or modification to a subcontract covered by (3) above, for which the price adjustment is expected to exceed $100,000, or such lesser amount as may be prescribed by the head of the agency.

"Any prime contract or change or modification thereto under which such certificate is required shall contain a provision that the price to the Government, including profit or fee, shall be adjusted to exclude any significant sums by which it may be determined by the head of the agency that such price was increased because the contractor or any subcontractor required to furnish such a certificate, furnished cost or pricing data which, as of a date agreed upon between the parties (which date shall be as close to the date of agreement on the negotiated price as is practicable), was inaccurate, incomplete, or noncurrent: Provided, That the requirements of this subsection need not be applied to contracts or subcontracts where the price negotiated is based on adequate price competition, established catalog or market prices of commercial items sold in substantial quantities to the general public, prices set by law or regulation or, in exceptional cases where the head of the agency determines that the requirements of this subsection may be waived and states in writing his reasons for such determination."

Title 18 United States Code

§ 1905. Disclosure of confidential information generally

Whoever, being an officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof, publishes, divulges, discloses, or makes known in any manner or to any extent not authorized by law any information coming to him in the course of his employment or official duties or by reason of any examination or investigation made by, or return, report or record made to or filed with, such department or agency or officer or employee thereof, which information concerns or relates to the trade secrets, processes, operations, style of work, or apparatus, or to the identity, confidential statistical data, amount or source of any income, profits, losses, or expenditures of any person, firm, partnership, corporation, or association; or permits any income return or copy thereof or any book containing any abstract or particulars thereof to be seen or examined by any person except as provided by law; shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and shall be removed from office or employment.

Armed Services Procurement Regulation, Title 32 Code of Federal Regulations[1]

§ 1-102 Applicability of subchapter.

This subchapter shall apply to all purchases and contracts made by the Department of Defense, within or outside the United States, for the procurement of supplies or services which obligate appropriated funds (including available contract authorizations), unless otherwise specified herein (but see § 1.109-4). [32 C.F.R. § 1.102 (1960); 24 Federal Register 3582 (May 5, 1959)][2]

§ 1-201 Definitions. As used throughout this subchapter, the following terms shall have the meaning set forth below: [32 C.F.R. § 1.201 (1960); 22 Federal Register 11040 (Dec. 31, 1957)][3]

§ 1-201.6 Contracts. "Contracts" means all types of agreements and orders for the procurement of supplies or services. It includes awards and preliminary notices of award; contracts of a fixed-price, cost, cost-plus-a-fixed-fee,

1. As the same were in effect when the contracts involved in this action were executed.

2. Current version: 32 C.F.R. § 1.102 (1967).

or incentive type; contracts providing for the issuance of job orders, task orders or task letters thereunder; letter contracts, letters of intent, and purchase orders. It also includes amendments and supplemental agreements with respect to any of the foregoing. [32 C.F.R. § 1.201-6 (1954); 22 Federal Register 11057 (Dec. 31, 1957)][4]

§ 3-403 Fixed-price-type contracts. The fixed-price-type contract generally provides for a firm price, or under appropriate circumstances may provide for an adjustable price, for the supplies or services which are being procured. Fixed-price contracts are of several types so designed as to facilitate proper pricing under varying circumstances. [32 C.F.R. § 3.403 (1960); 20 Federal Register 3727 (May 27, 1955)][5]

§ 3-403.1 Firm fixed-price contract—(a) Description. The firm fixed-price contract provides for a price which is not subject to any adjustment by reason of the cost experience of the contractor in the performance of the contract. This type of contract, when appropriately applied as set forth in paragraph (b) of this section, places the maximum risk and responsibility upon the contractor and affords him the greatest incentive for efficient performance with the resultant benefits in earnings. Utilization of the firm fixed-price contract imposes a minimum administrative burden on the contracting parties.

(b) Applicability. The firm fixed-price contract is suitable for use in procurements when stable and reasonably definite specifications are available and when fair and reasonable pricing can be achieved, such as where (1) adequate competition has made initial quotations effective; (2) prior purchases of the same or similar supplies or services provide reasonable price comparison; (3) experienced cost information or sound estimates of the probable cost of performance are available in the negotiation of contract prices; or (4) any other reliable basis for proper pricing can be utilized consistent with the purpose of this type of contract. The firm fixed-price contract is particularly suitable in the purchase of standard commercial items, modified commercial items, or military items for which adequate information on production and cost is available.

(c) Limitation. The firm fixed-price contract shall not be used when contingencies proposed in the contract price are considered unreasonable. [32 C.F.R. § 3.403-1 (1960); 20 Federal Register 3727-3728 (May 27, 1955)][6]

§ 7-104.15 Examination of records.

Pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2313(b), the following clause will be inserted in all negotiated fixed-price supply contracts in excess of $2,500, except as provided in § 6.701 of this subchapter.

Examination of Records

(a) The Contractor agrees that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall, until the expiration of three years after final payment under this contract, have access to and the right to examine any directly pertinent books, documents, papers and records of the Contractor involving transactions related to this contract.

(b) The Contractor further agrees to include in all his subcontracts hereunder a provision to the effect that the subcontractor agrees that the Comptroller General of the United States or any of his duly authorized representatives shall, until the expiration of three years after final payment under the subcontract, have access to and the right to examine any directly pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of such subcontractor involving transactions related to the subcontract. The term "subcontract" as used in this clause excludes (i) purchase orders not exceeding $1,000 and (ii) subcontracts or purchase orders for public utility services at rates established for uniform applicability to the general public. [32 C.F.R. § 7.104-15 (1960); 22 Federal Register 11049 (Dec. 31, 1957); 24 Federal Register 891 (February 9, 1959)][7]

ORDER AND JUDGMENT

This cause came on to be heard on Motion of Plaintiff for Summary Judgment and on Cross-Motion of Defendants for Summary Judgment, pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and the Court having considered the pleadings, the Stipulation of Facts and its exhibits, and the Court having heard arguments of counsel, and having found that there is no genuine issue of fact to be submitted to the Trial Court, and having concluded that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law, it is hereby

ORDERED that plaintiff's Motion for Summary Judgment be and the same hereby is granted; and it is further

ORDERED that the defendants' Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment be and the same hereby is denied; and it is further

ORDERED, ADJUDGED, DECREED AND DECLARED as follows:

1. Pursuant to the provisions contained in Contracts Numbered AF 33(604)-22221, AF 33(604)-31884, AF 33 (604)-22362 and AF 33(604)-28645 and the provisions of 10 USC § 2313(b), the Comptroller General of the United States and his duly authorized representatives have the right to examine those books, documents, papers and records of HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the aforesaid contracts.

2. The books, documents, papers and records of HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY relating to the cost of producing the items furnished by HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY under the aforesaid contracts, including costs of direct material, direct labor and overhead costs, directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the aforesaid contracts.

3. The Comptroller General and his duly authorized representatives have the right to examine the books, documents, papers and records of HEWLETT-PACKARD

COMPANY which relate to or otherwise disclose the cost of producing the items furnished under the aforesaid contracts, including costs of direct material, direct labor and overhead costs.

4. The defendants HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY, David Packard and Wilfred F. Cavier, and their agents, servants, attorneys, employees, and all persons in active concert or participation with them who receive actual notice of this judgment by personal service or otherwise, are hereby enjoined from preventing the duly authorized representatives of the Comptroller General of the United States from obtaining access to and examining, at reasonable times and places during regular business hours, the books, documents, papers and records mentioned in paragraph 2 of this judgment; and all said defendants and their agents, servants, attorneys, employees, and all persons in active concert or participation with them who receive actual notice of this judgment by personal service or otherwise, are hereby directed and enjoined to make the said books, documents, papers and records available to the authorized representatives of the Comptroller General on the premises of HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY at Palo Alto, California, at all reasonable times required by said representatives during the regular business hours of defendant HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY, with leave to the plaintiff to reapply for further relief if necessary.

5. Provided, however, that all rights of examination herein decreed and all mandatory and prohibitive injunctive provisions herein ordered shall be suspended for a period of 60 days from and after the entry of this judgment, and if a Notice of Appeal from this judgment is filed within said 60 days, then said rights of examination and said injunctive provisions shall be further suspended during the pendency of such appeal.

6. Defendants are hereby ordered and directed during the suspension of any provision of this judgment to safely keep and maintain all books, documents, papers and records of the HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY now in their possession or under their control which relate to the cost of producing the items furnished by HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY under the aforesaid contracts.

7. Let Judgment be entered accordingly.

[November 15, 1967]

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Southern Division

Before: CHAMBERS, HAMLEY and HAMLIN, Circuit Judges

HAMLEY, Circuit Judge:

The United States brought this action against Hewlett-Packard Company, a corporation, to enforce the Government's asserted right under 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b) (1964) to examine certain books and records of the company.[1] Plaintiff sought declaratory and injunctive relief. After defendants filed a responsive pleading the parties stipulated as to the relevant facts and filed cross motions for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion of the United States, denied that of Hewlett-Packard, and entered a judgment substantially as prayed for in the complaint. Hewlett-Packard appeals.

1. David Packard and Wilfred F. Cavier, President and Vice-President-Finance of Hewlett-Packard, respectively, were also named defendants, but it will not be necessary to make further reference to them in this opinion.

Hewlett-Packard is a manufacturer of electronic test and measurement equipment designed for general use where great precision in measurement is required. During the period from March, 1959 to January, 1961, the United States Department of the Air Force awarded to Hewlett-Packard four negotiated firm fixed-price contracts for equipment. The parties are agreed that, for the purposes of this case, the two contracts referred to below may be regarded as typical.

One of these, designated No. AF 33(604) 22221, was executed on March 16, 1959. It provided for the sale, to the United States, of standard commercial items of equipment then sold by Hewlett-Packard in substantial quantities to the general public. With one exception, each such item had been included in Hewlett-Packard's regularly published catalog for the previous three years or more. The catalog listed items for sale to the public at indicated prices. Each item qualified as a standard commercial article as defined by the Renegotiation Act of 1951, 65 Stat. 7, added by 70 Stat. 790 (1956), 57 U.S.C. App. § 1216(e) (1964), and was therefore exempt from renegotiation.[2]

In the contract of March 16, 1959, the contract price was determined upon the basis of the listed catalog prices of the particular item of equipment, less a volume discount. The Government's Request for Proposal which was incorporated into the contract contained a form statement of

2. Under this section the provisions of the Renegotiation Act were made mandatorily inapplicable to amounts received or accrued in a fiscal year under any contract or subcontract for a standard commercial article. In Senate Report 643, July 25, 1953, U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News (1954), p. 3880, the committee gave the following reasons for making this exemption mandatory rather than permissive:

> "The committee believes that in the case of standard commercial articles there is in most cases no basis or need for renegotiation since cost and pricing experience has already been acquired and prices made in a competitive market."

additional terms and conditions, but only the clauses check [sic] by the Government were to be applicable. One clause, entitled "Cost Data Information," called for the seller to provide the Government with detailed data concerning such cost items as material, labor and overhead. However, this clause was not checked and was therefore not applicable. Hewlett-Packard did not supply to the Government any information as to the costs of production or profit margins upon any of the items listed in this contract.

The other contract which the parties regarded as typical, designated No. AF 33 (604)-31882 [sic; should be -31884], was executed on January 30, 1961. This contract related to only one item of equipment, namely Hewlett-Packard instrument Model No. 620A. This was a standard commercial item then sold by the company in substantial quantities to the general public. The item had been included in Hewlett-Packard's regularly published catalog since 1952, for sale to the public at a catalog list price. The price had remained unchanged since the original date of introduction of the item.

At the date of execution of this contract, this item of equipment qualified as a standard commercial article as defined by the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended, and was therefore exempt from negotiation [sic; should be renegotiation]. The contract price was determined upon the basis of the listed catalog price, less a volume discount. Hewlett-Packard did not supply to the Government any information as to any of the company's costs of production or profit margins upon this contract item.[3]

3. In a memorandum dated January 4, 1961, prepared by employees of the Air Force, setting forth facts as to the negotiation of this contract, the following statement was made:

> "2. The Field Analyst was not contacted to evaluate subject proposal due to urgency (AOCP) of this proposal and

All four contracts were negotiated pursuant to chapter 137, Title 10, U.S.C. §§ 2301-14, entitled "Procurement Generally." A subsection of that chapter, 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b), provides that each contract negotiated under chapter 137 shall provide that the Comptroller General and his representatives are entitled for a period of three years after final payment, to examine any books, documents, papers or records of the contractor, or any of his subcontractors:

> "that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract or subcontract."

Consistent with this statutory provision each of the four contracts referred to above contained a clause 10, giving the Comptroller General and his representatives for a period of three years after final payment, access to and the right to examine:

> "any directly pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the Contractor involving transactions related to this contract."[4]

Purporting to exercise rights accorded by clause 10 of these contracts, representatives of the Comptroller General commenced an examination of the books and records of Hewlett-Packard in September, 1962. During this examination the company permitted access to books and records relating to sales prices of various instruments and parts sold under the four contracts. The representatives of the

An agency regulation pertaining to firm fixed-price contracts, and an agency statement of contract pricing policy, appear to recognize that production costs need not be inquired into in connection with the purchase of items having an established catalog or market price. (32 C.F.R. § 3.403.1 (1955), now 32 C.F.R. § 3.404.2 (1964), Defense Procurement Circular No. 5, May 12, 1964.)

4. The parties seem to be agreed that clause 10 in the four contracts in question was intended to give the Comptroller General the same rights of examination as specified in section 2313(b).

Comptroller General then requested all books, documents, papers or records of Hewlett-Packard:

> "relating to the pricing and cost of performance, support for prices charged to the Government, and such other necessary information which would permit such Representatives to review the reasonableness of the contract prices provided for in the aforesaid contracts."

This request was refused by Hewlett-Packard upon the ground that cost of production information was not directly pertinent to these contracts. In this suit, which the United States then instituted, the trial court disagreed with Hewlett-Packard, and judicially declared that the company's costs of direct material, direct labor and overhead costs in producing the items furnished under the contracts, directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, those contracts. The court further declared that the Comptroller General and his representatives have the right to examine the books, documents, papers and records of the company relating to or otherwise disclosing these production costs. Defendants were ordered to make this information available to the Government.[5]

Hewlett-Packard argues that the decision of the district court gave no effect to the words of limitation contained in 10 U.S.C. § 2313(b), and reflected in clause 10 of each contract.

The words of limitation to which the company refers limit the records which may be examined by the Comptroller General and his representatives to those "of the contractor, or of any of his subcontractors, that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract or subcontract." (Emphasis supplied.) Hewlett-Packard asserts that the district court has, in effect, placed a period after the word "subcontractors" in the quoted clause, and has thus given no practical effect to the words of limitation.

5. The trial court stayed the injunctive provisions of the judgment pending disposition of this appeal.

A mere reading of the judgment indicates that this is an overstatement. If, in its decree, the district court had placed a period after the word "subcontractors," then the Comptroller General and his representatives would have been authorized to examine the books of the company without limitation. Instead, the court declared that the Comptroller could examine any such records

> "relating to the cost of producing the items furnished by Hewlett-Packard Company under the aforesaid contracts, including costs of direct material, direct labor and overhead costs. . . ."

It is therefore clear that the district court sought to give effect to the words of limitation. The question is whether it gave full effect to those words. This depends upon the meaning to be attached to those words.

The key word in the limitation clause is "contract." If that word is used in section 2313(b) only with reference to the terms and condition of an agreement and the procedures whereby those terms and conditions were formulated, then the district court failed to give full effect to the limitation clause. As Hewlett-Packard correctly points out, under the stipulated facts summarized above, production costs were not taken into consideration in arriving at the terms and conditions of the contracts in question. Thus data pertaining to production costs could not be said to directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract, as so defined.

In our opinion, however, the word "contract," as used in this statute is intended to have a broader meaning, embracing not only the specific terms and conditions of the agreement, but also the general subject matter. The subject matter of these four contracts is the procurement of described property by the Government.

Production costs directly pertain to that subject matter, because if out of line with the contract price, the contract may have been an inappropriate means of meeting this particular procurement need of the Government. While this appraisal could not affect these particular contracts, it could lead to the use of other methods of meeting future procurement needs. Production costs involve transactions relating to the contract, because they encompass business arrangements made by the contractor in obtaining the materials, labor, facilities and the like required by it in fulfilling its commitment with reference to the subject matter of the contract.

Hewlett-Packard contends, in effect, that the sole purpose of the examination right accorded by section 2313(b) and clause 10 of these contracts, is to enable the Comptroller General to find out whether the particular contracts which give rise to the examination had been performed in accordance with their terms and whether the contracting officer had been defrauded or misled in entering into the contract.

We finding nothing in the words of the statute, its legislative history, or administrative interpretation, or in the impact of other statutes, which supports this view. On the contrary, it seems to us that if such a limited scope of examination had been intended by Congress it would have found the means to so indicate. The term "contract" could have been given a restricted meaning, or the scope of the permissible examination could have been specifically limited to lines of inquiry relevant to the legality and faithful performance of the particular contract giving rise to the examination.

Affirmed.

HEWLETT-PACKARD COMPANY, ET AL., PETITIONERS

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

MEMORANDUM FOR THE UNITED STATES IN OPPOSITION

The Department of the Air Force awarded several negotiated firm fixed-price contracts to Hewlett-Packard Company for standard commercial electronic equipment of a type also sold by the company in substantial quantities to the general public. The contract prices were determined on the basis of Hewlett-Packard's listed catalogue prices, less volume discounts. The contracts were negotiated pursuant to Chapter 137, 10 U.S.C. 2301–2314, entitled "Procurement Generally," which provides (10 U.S.C. 2313(b)) that each contract negotiated under the chapter:

> shall provide that the Comptroller General and his representatives are entitled, until the expiration of three years after final payment, to ex> amine any books, documents, papers, or records of the contractor, or any of his subcontractors, that directly pertain to, and involve transactions relating to, the contract or subcontract.

Accordingly, the contracts between the government and Hewlett-Packard provided that the Comptroller General and his representatives had the right to examine:

> any directly pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the Contractor involving transactions related to this contract.

On the basis of this contractual language, representatives of the Comptroller General requested access to all books and records of Hewlett-Packard relating to the costs it incurred in producing the articles furnished under the contracts. The company refused this request, and the United States then commenced this action to enforce the Comptroller General's rights to examine those items. The district court entered judgment for the United States, and the court of appeals affirmed.

Petitioners' basic contention is that because the contract prices were to be determined on the basis of fixed catalogue prices less a volume discount, rather than on a cost-plus basis, the Comptroller General had no right to information relating to Hewlett-Packard's cost of production. Thus, they argue that the language of 10 U.S.C. 2313(b) giving the Comptroller General the right to examine any records "that * * * pertain to * * * the contract" is limited to the specific terms and conditions of the agreement between the parties and does not refer to the general subject matter of the contract.

Petitioners' argument misconceives the purpose for which the Comptroller General was given the authority to examine records relating to government contracts. One of the statute's major purposes was to "deter those persons who otherwise might abuse the authority to negotiate certain contracts without advertising." S. Rep. No. 603, 82d Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 2–4. In expressing his view as to the merit and propriety of the proposed legislation, the then Acting Comptroller General assured the chairmen of the House and Senate Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments that any abuses discovered by the General Accounting Office in exercising the authority conferred by the legislation would be promptly brought to the attention of the proper officials, and, if warranted, to Congress' attention as well. Ibid.

Thus, contrary to petitioners' suggestions (Pet. 9–10), it is immaterial that the cost data sought by the Comptroller General was not needed by the government when it negotiated the contracts here involved in order to determine whether there has been compliance with the terms of these contracts. While the government may not be able to use the data sought to affect rights and obligations arising under the particular contracts here involved, it will be able to use that data for other relevant purposes. For example, on the basis of his examination of the company's cost data, the Comptroller General may conclude that the government has been paying too high a price for such standard articles of commerce, and recommend that in the future such articles should be procured by means of formal advertising rather than by negotiations.

It is therefore respectfully submitted that the petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

ERWIN N. GRISWOLD,
Solicitor General.
